A Market for Unusual Vegetables

Every Saturday, a farmers' market is held in the town of Bellford. One of the farmers, Nina Reed, used to leave some of her carrots at home because they were bent or had two roots. They were just as fresh as her other carrots, but she believed customers would choose the ones that looked more like those sold in supermarkets.

One morning, Reed brought some of the unusual carrots to the market and set them out beside her regular ones at the same price. Few customers bought them, but several stopped to ask how they could prepare the carrots. The following week, Reed offered samples of carrot soup and gave customers a simple recipe. By noon, she had sold all of the unusual carrots.

Other farmers at the market soon began bringing in vegetables they had previously left at home. However, the market organizers decided that cooked samples could only be served at a shared table with a sink nearby. Since the table could not be used by everyone at once, they made a schedule so that each farmer could take a turn.

(11) Why did Reed originally leave some of her carrots at home?

1 She thought their appearance would make them harder to sell.
2 She wanted to use them to make soup for her family.
3 She did not have enough room to display all her carrots.
4 She believed they were less fresh than the rest of her carrots.

(12) Why did the market organizers make a schedule?

1 To decide what each farmer could sell.
2 To stagger the farmers' delivery times.
3 To give each farmer a turn at the table.
4 To help shoppers buy soup before closing.
